Indians, and the jurisdiction in cases of crimes committed by them off their proper "reservation" territory (United States v. Yellow Sun, p. 271); the right of an Indian to sue as a "foreign citizen" in the courts of the United States (Karraho v. Adams, p. 344), and the taxation by the states of land included in Indian reservations, &c., all belonging to the class of difficult questions, growing out of the peculiar situation of the Indian tribes as subordinate and "protected," yet quasi independent nations.

In addition to these, however, the volume contains a large number of important cases on questions growing out of the war, the rights and liabilities of military commanders, the removal of causes from state to Federal courts, bankruptcy, internal revenue, and admiralty.

A majority of the opinions were written by the reporter, and they exhibit the learning, accuracy, and vigor which have always characterized the productions of Judge DILLON. Perhaps the most desirable quality in a judge, at the present day, from a professional point of view, is directness; the faculty which sees quickly the point of the case, grapples it at once, resolutely, and then knows that the work is done. In this respect the opinions in the present volume will bear a favorable comparison with any recently delivered in any reported tribunal.
